CIA Agent Takes Stand, Testimony Restricted

BALTIMORE—Juri Raus, who has accused a fellow Estonian immigrant of being a Communist KGB agent, spent nearly two hours on the witness stand in federal court here today.

Eerik Heine, the man against whom he made the accusation, sat a few feet away listening sternly to his testimony.

Sitting at the table with Raus' attorneys was Lawrence Houston, general counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency, who was sent personally by CIA Director William F. Raborn to instruct Raus on what questions he would be permitted to answer.

In three affidavits submitted to the court in connection with Heine's $110,000 slander suit against Raus, the CIA has identified Raus as a CIA agent and has said that he was instructed to warn Estonians in this country that Heine was a "dispatched Soviet Intelligence operative, a KGB agent."

In a paper filed with the court this morning, Raborn involved himself personally in the case for the first time. He said that he was sending Houston "to assist in protecting information relating to intelligence sources and methods."

Raus was permitted to answer a number of routine questions such as his name, address, age and birthplace during the taking of the deposition.

But the government objected when Heine's attorney, Ernest C. Raskauskas, attempted to learn whether Raus was paid by the CIA and how he was paid.

After a conference, Houston told Chief Federal District Judge Roszel C. Thomsen that Raus had been paid "directly or indirectly" for his services to which he made the statements about Heine.

Raus mentioned — in answering a question about his service in the Army reserve — that he had attended an intelligence school last summer. He was not permitted to answer any further questions about the location of the school or what he studied there.

In answer to questions, Raus said that he had filed annual federal income tax statements, but he was not permitted to say what total income he had reported.

In answer to another question, Raus admitted that, at a meeting of the Legion of Estonian Liberation in New York on Nov. 19, 1963, he had called Heine a "Communist and a KGB agent." At that time he was national commander of the Estonian Legion.

He also said that "I stated that whoever does not believe what I have said is free to contact the FBI."

"Did you make the statements on the basis of information supplied by the FBI?" Raskauskas asked.

Raus said he had not.
